This item is printed on demand - Print on Demand Neuware - Seminar paper from the year 2006 in the subject Politics - International Politics - Region: Western Europe, printed single-sided, grade: Gut, School of Advanced Internat. Studies (School of Advanced International Studies (SAIS)), course: Europe after the Cold War, 14 entries in the bibliography, language: English, abstract: Most of the second half of the 20th century was marked by a strong German-American relationship whose primary roots were the United States military contributions in the fight against Nazi-Germany during World War II and its generous Marshall Plan to help rebuild a moribund German post-war economy. After the outbreak of the Cold War, deepening the transatlantic relations was a strategic necessity for both sides of the Atlantic, given the imminent geopolitical threat from the communist Soviet Union. In the decades to follow, ameliorating the partnership with the United States was, besides fostering European integration, the major goal of German foreign policy. However, the transatlantic relationship changed significantly after the end of the Cold War in the early 1990s. In the aftermath of the terrorist attacks of September 11, 2001 the German-American relationship was put to a particularly hard test. Although the Schröder administration's first reaction was unlimited solidarity and support for the invocation of Article 5 of the NATO treaty, Germany did not support the United States decision to go to war in Iraq, which implied serious tensions with the Bush administration. This paper's purpose is to show how the relationship between Germany and the United States has evolved during the last five years. In the first part, I would like to illustrate the evolution of Germany's foreign policy towards the United States in the aftermath of September...
