Not illustrated. 1894 Excerpt: .for wage earning is at stake, no care and no caution can be too great. In some respects it would seem that animals of intelligence are wiser, if they do not know more, than men. They soon discover that the attraction of gravitation and the movements of the tides are not to be disputed or argued with, and they get out of their way or put themselves in harmony with their laws. The same far-sightedness ought to prevail in human affairs. But how often it does not. The empiric in medical practice often has a more enthusiastic and numerous crowd after him than the most learned and scientific practitioner who will not step forward in the dark or offer to perform miracles. The same phenomenon which would show that a large number of mankind prefer a great and dazzling hope, full of prismatic promises, to a...
