Reviews

This publication is indeed gripping and intriguing. It is actually written in basic terms and not difficult to understand. I am just pleased to explain how here is the greatest publication we have read through during my own lifestyle and could be the best pdf for at any time.

It was also recommended that projects be encouraged to include more conservatism in base estimates early in the process and be required to carefully evaluate all key project assumptions including design heritage credits. At a presentation before the Goddard Space Flight Center Symposium in June 2008, a member of the Aerospace Corporation discussed perspectives on mission cost and schedule performance trends, building on his teams review of 40 NASA robotic science missions. The teams findings included the following: While estimates become more accurate as a project matures, the greatest growth manifests itself late in the project during integration and test. Data highlighted that the primary reason for cost and schedule growth is internal project technical and development issues often associated with instruments. Initial project estimates may be unreliable due to design and technology immaturity and inherent optimism. Better technical and programmatic appraisal early in the life cycle is needed along with independent assessment of design and programmatic assumptions. In addition, the team analyzed the relationship between cost, schedule and complexity. A complexity index was established for the projects reviewed based on performance, mass, power and technology choices. The team plotted missions cost versus complexity index and found a near linear rising band where successful missions cluster. On the other hand, those missions failed that were below that clustered range. This led the team to characterize this area as the no-fly zone. GAOs Characterization of NASA Acquisition Management as High-Risk Since 1990, GAO has periodically reported on government...
