We hear a lot of statistics about dangers to children, but how do parents know where to focus instead of being afraid of everything and turning into helicopter parents, those excessively overprotective parents? The Worry Clock: A Parents Guide to Worrying Smarter about the Real Dangers to Your Child, puts all the dangers into context, shows which are most dangerous, and gives ideas on what to do about it. The book reveals some startling information on what to do and not to worry about children, including: Electrical outlets are less deadly than most parents probably believe. Two and a half times as many children age one to four were killed by dogs as died by falling down steps or sticking something in an outlet, but all three were extremely rare. Parents should think twice (or more) about where an infant sleeps. Infant deaths from rebreathing and other forms of suffocation account for more deaths than all causes for the next four years (ages 1-4). Mom is probably right that she won't roll over on the child, but babies are vulnerable to many other dangers in adult beds and couches. Drowning in a home pool is particularly dangerous for toddler boys. Drowning is the most common cause of death for toddlers and is particularly dangerous for the youngest boys, who were last seen in the house and were under a parent's supervision. Teenage driving is the top worry across your child's life. Teen driving should be the number one focus of your attention and new drivers getting driving practice without other teens in the car is the best way to help your teen survive. A baby's inconsolable crying is common, but it is also a frequent cause...
